INKTENEBRIS

INKTENEBRIS is an ongoing exploration of darkness, identity, memory, transformation, and the hidden structures of the subconscious.

Working exclusively with ballpoint pen, I create monochromatic drawings through thousands of deliberate marks and layers of ink. The process is slow, demanding, and irreversible. Every line remains visible, every decision becomes permanent, and every image gradually emerges from darkness through patience and repetition.

My work is influenced by psychological horror, dream imagery, isolation, distorted perception, and the fragile relationship between reality and imagination. Human forms dissolve into unfamiliar shapes, familiar objects become unsettling, and ordinary experiences transform into symbolic narratives that exist beyond direct explanation.

Rather than presenting clear answers, these drawings invite interpretation. The imagery is intentionally open-ended, allowing viewers to project their own experiences, fears, memories, and emotions onto the work. The goal is not to dictate meaning but to create a space where meaning can emerge through personal reflection.

Many of the figures that appear throughout INKTENEBRIS exist in states of transformation. They are suspended between identities, between memory and forgetting, between beauty and discomfort. These visual ambiguities reflect the uncertainty that often exists beneath everyday perception.

The choice of ballpoint pen is central to the practice. Unlike many traditional art materials, ballpoint pen allows no erasure. Every mark contributes to the final image. This permanence mirrors the accumulation of memories, experiences, and emotions that shape personal identity over time.

Through INKTENEBRIS, I seek to create artwork that lingers beyond the moment it is seen. The drawings are intended to provoke curiosity, unease, introspection, and imagination. They invite viewers to enter unfamiliar spaces where darkness becomes a source of discovery rather than something to avoid.

Ultimately, the work exists between observation and interpretation. It embraces mystery, ambiguity, and transformation while remaining open to individual meaning. Each drawing becomes both a personal exploration and an invitation for others to confront the unknown within themselves.
